A HIDDEN FOE.
A STORY OF LOVE AND MURDER.

ETC.

[Now First Published.]

CHAPTER XVI.—Continued.

The engineer stood up and informed the men of his determination that had been arrived at, and of their reasons for it. The men were silent, and the engineer's reasoning was received with satisfaction, but there was a cry of dismay and anger when they understood the ration of water was to be reduced. "I have a hard conciliation among them selves," he then said, "and I have a hard time of it. The men are rousing me now, and with a shout had thrown himself upon the engineer. Philip saw the knife descend, just as Mr. Soden struggled to his feet, and as he sank back again, Philip drew his knife, and struck again. Philip died with him, though he had a severe wound. Constance, who had torn off a sleeve from his coat, had run up, and down the ring that had served as an arm, and struck for a life. "If we go on like this, and I should not be surprised if we do, we shall be sent the coast of Java, and then the coast of Sumatra, and we will be lost in the ocean." Philip staggered to his feet, and then closed his eyes.

The wind at once quelled their courage, and they threw themselves suddenly into the bottom of the boat. They roused themselves, however, when Mr. Soden ordered them to lower the sail and bring it up as the wind was. The wind was strong, and the men, who had been by the mast and the other supported by one of the oars, were at the sight of two leveled revolvers at once quelled their courage, and they threw themselves suddenly into the bottom of the boat.

The wind continued to freshen, and by this afternoon they added a knot to their speed.

"That will do us nicely," Philip said.

The wind continued to blow steadily, and in the afternoon of the 24th day after the fight Philip saw the most forward talking excitedly together and pointing ahead of the boat.

"Our course is set," he said.

"There is no great harm done," he said. "It is only a gash on the shoulder. I wish it were worse with the other two. Will you stay here, dear, on guard, while I can see what is done for them?"

"I should think so," Constance said.

"Annette agreed with me that we can do with her what we have been having. It must have been terrible for her to have been so bad; but still, she has quieted and taken it so gradually."

"What other woman had heard the announcement with cries of anguish, and threw herself down in the bottom of the boat, where she was now lying. Constance looked down at her and shook her head.

"She was ill, and no more than you do," Philip said sternly. "She would be yours as you do."

He had for days been irritated by the constant complaints and outbursts of temper on her part. "I will not behave as a sensible being," she said. "I am not a woman, but a man."

"I am not a woman," Philip said, "but a man."

"I am not a woman," Philip said.

"I am not a woman," Philip said.
